

Two Things That Make It Easier to Send a Family Our Way

A quick reference for your front desk and clinical staff, built around the two moments a referral to Aspire is most likely to stall: the out-of-network question, and a family that isn't quite ready yet.

1

Handling "They're Out-of-Network"

Cost is often the first thing a parent hears, and the first reason they quietly don't follow up. One line, said before they leave the room, usually resolves it.

"They're out-of-network, but they handle the reimbursement paperwork for you, and most families get a meaningful amount back."

WHY THIS WORKS

Naming Thrizer, our reimbursement partner, by name signals there's a real system behind this, not just a vague reassurance. Families don't need to understand insurance to hear that the paperwork isn't on them.

2

When a Parent Isn't Ready Yet

Some families need a lower-pressure next step than "here's a number, call when you're ready," which quietly tends to become never.

"Would it be alright if someone from their office reached out to you directly? No pressure, just a conversation."

WHY THIS WORKS

This shifts the first move from the parent to us. We respond to every referral within 24 hours, so once we have a name and number, the follow-through is on our team, not on a parent who's still deciding.
